Chapter 1

The Police Career

- Despite highly publicized police shootings in recent years and the racial tensions that they ignited the public confidence in the police has improved.
- Police are moving from the mindset of the occupying warrior to more of a Guardian as the majority of police work involves service rather than crime fighting.
- In order to hire the best police officers, an effective recruitment program is essential. The purpose of recruitment is to find and retain qualified applicants to serve in the police profession.
- Applicants for the position of police officer must go through a rigorous selection process. The selection process generally includes a written test, physical ability assessment, polygraph, oral interview, background investigation, psychological assessment, and medical and drug screening.
- Once a police applicant has successfully completed the selection process and is offered employment, he or she will report to the training academy where they will learn the craft of policing.
- Upon completion of formal police academy training, the rookie police officer begins the field training program. During the field training program the rookie officer is assigned to work alongside of a veteran police officer (field training officer) for a specified period of time.
- Once a police officer graduates from the police academy that doesn't mean that their training is complete. Police officers undergo training for the rest of their careers; this is referred to as in-service training. Many states mandate that police officers receive a minimum number of in-service training hours annually to retain their law enforcement certification.
- Generally new officers enter at the rank of police officer and are assigned to the patrol division. Eventually, through a testing or selection process, the officer is eligible for promotion to detective or sergeant. Ranks after this point vary from one agency to another but generally follow the paramilitary course of Corporal, Lieutenant, Captain, Deputy Police Chief, and Chief of Police.
- Police work is often full of stress. This can manifest itself physically with health related problems or social problems. There are increased rates of divorce, alcoholism, suicide, and other health problems. In addition to occupational stress there is job burnout and the cynicism of police officers.
