7. What are 'settler states', and why are they important for understanding contemporary international order?
8. Is economic exploitation an inevitable feature of the contemporary international order? Why or why not?
9. Evaluate each of the three main dynamics that led to the 'great divergence'. To what extent do the legacies of each of these three dynamics still impact the current international order?
10. Compare and contrast China's experience with Western imperialism with that of another country of your choice. Then evaluate the implications these two experiences have had for each country in the contemporary era. How are these cases similar? How are they different?
11. How has the conventional emphasis on the Peace of Westphalia as the origin of the contemporary international order impacted the field of International Relations? What have been its conceptual contributions? In what ways has it limited our understanding of global politics?
12. To what extent is the contemporary international order impacted by globalization?
13. Identify three types of 'regularized exchange' and evaluate the relative importance of each for creating interdependence.
14. What is the difference between regional order and international order? Discuss with reference to specific examples.
15. In this chapter, international orders are defined as 'regularized practices of exchanges among discrete political units that recognize each other to be independent'. To what extent does an attempt to define 'international order' maintain state-centric (or, literally, 'nation'-centric) assumptions? Does the emergence of non-state actors such as international non-governmental organizations and transnational corporations challenge this approach? Why or why not?
