Short Answer Questions

95. Describe what C. Wright Mills meant by the term "sociological imagination."

The sociological imagination refers to an awareness of the relationship between the individual and society that is accessible to everyone. The links between our own personal reality and the social world in which we live are made visible when we 'imagine' how the increasingly heavy traffic in our cities makes it difficult for buses to run on time, and that can cause us to be late for work or university classes. Conversely, the new game of Pokemon Go is being claimed as an antidote to depression and anxiety. So a technological development has unintended consequences for individuals, in this case positive.

96. Discuss what separates sociology from common sense. Be sure to give some examples of how sociological research might dispel commonly accepted views.

Common sense derives from commonly held beliefs, such as that people panic when disasters happen, such as floods or forest fires. Sociological research has shown this is most often untrue. In the example of disasters, people develop greater social organization and structures to deal with a society's problems. Out of control forest fires in BC and Alberta, such as the Fort McMurray fire are examples of great coordination among community and first responder services. Common sense is not always wrong, but cannot be taken as correct either. It needs to be checked against carefully collected and analysed facts.

97. Explain the similarities and differences between the three major sociological perspectives of functionalism, conflict theory, and symbolic interactionism. Identify which perspectives use a macro-level or a micro-level of analysis.

The standpoint of a sociologist can shape what perspective they turn to in understanding their observations. For example, functionalists focus on what holds society together, while conflict perspectives are interested in how social change arises out of conflict or disagreements. Symbolic interactionists are interested in the meanings of actions and words. Symbolic interaction offers a micro-level analysis of society, while functionalism and conflict perspectives focus on a macro-level analysis.

98. Describe the similarities and differences between conflict theory and the feminist perspective.

Feminist perspectives include Liberal, Marxist, Socialist, Radical, Transnational and Critical Race feminisms. Critical race feminism identifies women's self-definition and naming of their reality, while Liberal, Marxist, Socialist and Radical feminists focus on the larger social structures. For example, Marxist feminists focus mainly on capitalism's shaping of the social classes, and how this has affected the status of women. Socialist feminists include patriarchy as well as capitalism in their analysis, while Radical feminists focus mainly on the patriarchal dominance that oppresses women. Critical race feminism attempts to bring about women's self-definition, to have them name their own reality, free of patriarchal domination or the legacy of colonialism. Feminist perspectives therefore overlap with, and differ from, conflict theory. Conflict theory is interested in conflict or tensions between groups in society, ranging from groups negotiating differences to open conflict, from labour negotiations or strikes, to party politics. Recent developments in the prominence of the environmental, feminist, indigenous and race rights movements etc, have given these conflicts, and the changes they bring, greater attention. The discipline of sociology views conflict theory as one way to gain insights into these changes. Feminism, and specifically, Marxist, Socialist, Radical and Transnational feminist perspectives overlap considerably with conflict theory in their focus on the inequality of women, either in economic or in social structures, such as male-female relations, generally.

99. Discuss a cup of coffee from the point of view of a Symbolic interactionist, a Conflict theorist and a Functionalist

Many Canadians talk about their first cup of coffee in terms of it waking them up, or helping them get ready for their day. When they get together with friends they may meet at a coffee shop. When guests arrive at a house they are likely to be offered a cup of coffee. Symbolic interactionists would analyze these different meanings of a cup of coffee. They might research its different uses in terms of their social significance. A Conflict theorist would focus on the exploitation that is involved in the production of the beans, their sale to the coffee makers and to the retailers. Coffee growers and pickers are not paid a living wage. This has led to a Fair Trade movement in which Co-ops are formed between growers and between traders to ensure no exploitation is involved. Social change is arising out of the conflict over a fair return on labour. Conflict theorists might also point to the environmental exploitation and destruction of rain forests in order to grow more coffee. Shade grown coffee is now being offered in many stores. Again the conflict between the environment and the exploitation of it is beginning to produce a new way of growing coffee, a social change. The Functionalist theorist would look at both the drinking and the production of coffee as contributing to stability. Profits from coffee production and sales are good for a nation's economy, and the ritual of drinking coffee at home or outside the home, contribute to social stability.
