33) How people are paid affects their behaviour at work, which affects an organization's chances of success. For most employers, compensation is a major part of the total cost of running a business, and often it is the single largest part of operating cost. These two facts together mean that well-designed compensation systems can help an organization achieve and sustain competitive advantage.

34) There are a few observations of what may have contributed to the gender wage gap: that women are more likely to study health and education, whereas men are more likely to study engineering and other technology fields; that women are more willing than men to adjust their work location and hours to take care of young children and elderly parents, and to do most if not all of the "unpaid" housework; and, finally, that nearly one in three women work in sales and service occupations, whereas men are likely to work in construction trades, in transport, and as equipment operators.

35) The two major categories of total rewards are relational returns and total compensation. The relational returns (development opportunities, status, opportunity to belong, challenging work, and so on) are the psychological returns people believe they receive in the workplace. Total compensation is more transactional and includes pay received directly as cash (e.g., base, merit increases, incentives, cost-of-living adjustments) and indirectly as benefits (e.g., pensions, medical insurance, programs to help balance work and life demands).

Compensation 6ce Edition by Yap Ch01

36) Work/life programs that help employees better integrate their work and life responsibilities include time away from work (e.g., vacations, jury duty), access to services to meet specific needs (e.g., drug counselling, financial planning, referrals for child- and eldercare), and flexible work arrangements (e.g., telecommuting, non-traditional schedules, non-paid time off). Responding to the tight labour market for highly skilled employees and the changing demographics of the workforce (e.g., two-income families that demand employer flexibility so that family obligations can be met), many Canadian employers are giving higher priority to these forms of benefits.

37) Short-term incentives are typically one-time payments without a permanent effect on labour costs. When performance declines, incentive pay automatically declines, too.

Long-term incentives are intended to focus employee efforts on multiyear results. Typically they are in the form of stock ownership or options to buy stock at a predetermined price.

38) A pay model contains three basic building blocks: (1) the strategic compensation objectives, (2) the strategic policies that form the foundation of the compensation system, and (3) the techniques of compensation.

39) Procedural fairness refers to the process used to make decisions about pay. It suggests that the way a pay decision is made may be as important to employees as the result of the decision, which is distributive fairness. The fairness objective calls for fair treatment for all employees by recognizing both employee contributions (e.g., higher pay for greater performance, experience, or training) and employee needs (e.g., a fair wage as well as fair procedures).

40) Internal alignment refers to pay comparisons between jobs or skill levels inside a single organization. Jobs and people's skills are compared in terms of their relative contribution to the organization's objectives. External competitiveness refers to compensation relationships external to the organization (i.e., compared with competitors). External competitiveness directly affects both efficiency and fairness. Employee conditions refers to the degree of emphasis placed on performance, which directly affects employees' attitudes and work behaviours. Employers with strong pay-for-performance policies put greater emphasis on incentives and merit pay. A policy regarding management of the pay system is the last building block in the pay model, which recognizes that a pay system will not achieve its objectives unless it is managed properly. Proper management of the pay system ensures that the right people get the right pay for achieving the right objectives in the right way.
