Q50. [Essay]

According to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, how can states improve their approaches to prevent delinquency? In your opinion, which is the most important? Support your answer.

Suggested answer: Sample response: According to the OJJDP, states should improve legal representation for juveniles, inform and assist juveniles of the opportunity for record expungement and sealing, addressing the differential needs of girls in or at risk of entering the juvenile justice system, and monitoring and training on compliance with the core requirements of OJJDP. The OJJDP also reports that many states need to make progress addressing the disproportionately higher involvements of juveniles from marginalized communities. In my opinion, the racial and ethnic disparities and disproportionate minority contact are the most important improvements that states need to make to prevent delinquency. Although almost all states are able to comply with the first three requirements of the OJJDP, many are still falling short of their goals addressing racial and ethnic disparity.

Q51. [Essay]

Discuss the concept of confidentiality in the juvenile justice system. How has the concept of confidentiality changed over time?

Suggested answer: Sample response: Confidentiality in the juvenile justice system typically prohibits the public, and often the press, from attending juvenile court proceedings to protect the privacy of the youths involved. It also allows for cases to be permanently sealed or expunged, thus protecting the young person's record from any future scrutiny. The concept of confidentiality has undergone a loosening in recent years. Where once confidentiality was closely guarded, states and the federal system have been more permissive in releasing details of juvenile justice proceedings. In 1977, the USSC ruled that it was unconstitutional to prohibit the publication of the legally obtained name and photograph of a young person involved in a juvenile justice proceeding. Similarly, in 1979, the court ruled that the state cannot punish the press for publishing the name of a juvenile accused of delinquency if legally obtained. In the 1980s, most states removed the confidentiality provisions and made juvenile justice proceedings more open. By 2011, only 13 states held closed juvenile justice proceedings. Most states do, however, have provisions about sealing and/or expunging records of juveniles, but most states also have provisions for unsealing such records, too.

Q52. [Essay]

Discuss the three ways in which waivers to adult court usually occur. Which is the most common and why?

Suggested answer: Sample response: There are three ways in which waivers for juveniles to adult court typically occur. First, for serious violent offenses, such as capital crime or murder, statutory law automatically puts the juvenile in the jurisdiction of the criminal justice system and results in an automatic waiver of the juvenile to the adult court. This waiver is also known as a legislative waiver, mandatory waiver, or statutory exclusion. Second, the prosecutorial waiver or direct file holds that certain offenses are recognized as having concurrent jurisdiction which means they are in the jurisdiction of both the juvenile justice system and the criminal justice system. In this circumstance, prosecutors then have the discretion to decide whether to transfer such cases to the criminal justice system. The third waiver is the most common and is the judicial waiver. The judicial waiver gives the judge discretion to determine whether to transfer a case to the criminal justice system. The judicial waiver is the most common partially because it is available in almost all states, whereas the other waivers are only available in a few states.

Q53. [Essay]

Explain the concept of diversion in the juvenile justice system. What are the advantages of diversion?

Suggested answer: Sample response: Diversion refers to handling a person's case informally outside the juvenile court. This can occur at any point in the juvenile justice system, from apprehension to post-adjudication. Depending upon the particular situation, it may be more beneficial for all stakeholders if the youth is diverted from the juvenile court system to be referred to support services that may better provide for their psychosocial and behavioral needs. Such support services include help regarding substance use disorder, mental health, and mentoring. Diversion may also help to avoid stigmas that could exacerbate antisocial behaviors.

Q54. [Essay]

Explain the process by which a complaint concerning child maltreatment by a parent is handled by the child welfare system.

Suggested answer: Sample response: While the child welfare system is not a formal part of the juvenile court system, depending upon the situation, it may play a crucial role within that system to the benefit of the youth. During investigation of the family for neglect or abuse of the youth, the child may be removed from the home while being referred to any necessary support services. The case is referred to the local juvenile court, and the court's handling and determining of the case is supervised by the child protective services agency. The protective services of the child welfare system seeks to ensure the welfare of the child by promoting a healthy and safe home atmosphere. The 1974 Child Abuse and Prevention Act (CAPTA) defines child maltreatment as severe physical or psychological harm to children, including sexual or emotional, caused by primary caregivers, whether parents, babysitters, or extended relatives. State policies vary, but federal laws always apply the funding and guidelines necessary as implemented by the Children's Bureau, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), for welfare programs at the local and state level. When there are reports of child abuse, Child Protective Services (CPS) will intervene to set corrective procedures and services in motion.
